

NAATI TRANSLATOR STAMPS

A NAATI translator stamp is used by translators to certify their translations. These stamps can be purchased by any currently certified or recognised practising translator.

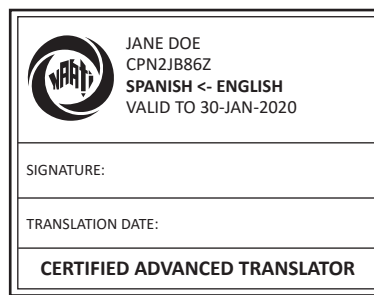

Below are examples of the current design of a NAATI-issued translator stamp. All officially issued NAATI translator stamps are in blue ink.

If a translation was completed within the period as noted on the NAATI stamp, then the translation can be accepted as a translation completed by an appropriately certified translator.

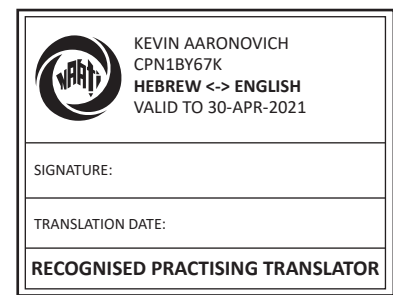

A NAATI certification or recognised practising credential can be verified at any time by going to www.naati.com.au.

Prior to the start of the Certification system in January 2018, NAATI issued translator stamps under the old accreditation system (see below for examples). These stamps are no longer issued.

The 'Expires' date on these stamps refer to the potential expiry date for the credential (at the time the stamp was issued). It does not reflect a date after which a translation is invalid or unacceptable. A translation from a NAATI credentialed translator should include the date at which the translation was completed.

If you need to verify whether a translator was accredited or recognised when the translation was completed, please contact NAATI's National Office.
